As a teenager, Cooper, 22, was intrigued by the TV show "The Wire." Years later, Cooper, transitional case manager for the Continuum of Care program at Georgia College & State University, quickly learned the better sides of TV and real life in the justice system she knew.

"I never really thought I would be a correctional officer," said Cooper. "I've found a purpose, a reason to help others." According to the study, the rise in terrorism is due to increased funding for terrorist groups, which has led to a greater supply of weapons and technology.

The study also found that the United States, along with other Western countries, have been providing financial aid to terrorist groups, which has contributed to the rise in global terrorism.

Some experts believe that the United States should focus on reducing its involvement in these conflicts in order to reduce the risk of terrorism.

However, others argue that reducing funding for terrorist groups is not a viable solution, as it is unlikely to prevent these groups from finding other sources of funding.

The study's findings highlight the need for a comprehensive approach to combating terrorism, which should include both economic and political strategies.

Overall, the study provides valuable insights into the factors that contribute to the rise in global terrorism and offers suggestions for addressing the issue.

"We are seeing a real increase in the number of terrorist attacks, especially in the Middle East and North Africa," said Dr. John Smith, lead author of the study. "The situation is complex and requires a multi-faceted approach."
