Students, families, and community members gathered on the lawn of Georgia's Old Governor's Mansion Saturday evening for Music at the Mansion, a picnic-style concert hosted by the Georgia College Department of Music.

As the sun started to set, people spread out blankets and unpacked picnic baskets, turning the historic lawn into a laid-back concert space. Instead of a formal setting, the event felt casual and welcoming, with groups of friends talking, laughing, and enjoying the music together.

The concert featured a mix of vocal and instrumental ensembles, giving student musicians the chance to perform in front of both their peers and the Milledgeville community. The variety kept the audience engaged, with each performance bringing a different energy to the night.

"I like how relaxed it is," said GCSU student

Chase Harrington. "You don't have to dress up or sit quietly the whole time. It just feels like everyone is here to enjoy it together."

The setting of the Mansion added to the experience, with the historic building in the background and the open lawn creating a peaceful atmosphere. As the evening went on, more people continued to arrive, filling the space with a steady crowd.

The event also served a larger purpose beyond entertainment. A suggested $5 donation was collected to support both the Mansion and the music department, helping to provide resources for students and support their education.

By the end of the night, Music at the Mansion felt less like a traditional concert and more like a community gathering, where music brought people together in a simple but meaningful way.
